A Misplaced
Tropical Pond Leads to a Feminist Daydream
by Marcia LeBeau

A Misplaced Tropical Pond Leads to a Feminist Daydream

by Marcia LeBeau

There's a body of water in New Jersey that looks like a tropical sea. A German immigrant named Johann Vass bought the land with White Lake on it 260 years ago.

Johann had four wives because three of them died during childbirth.
I don't know much about the Mrs. Vasses, but I gather from the moment they married Mr. Vass, they tended and bred most everything in that home until the day they bled out for life. I'm curious if they wondered what it was all for as they dizzily watched the patch of raspberry preserve slowly stain the white sheet beneath them.

The one they had laundered only last week.

Author

Marcia LeBeau is the author of A CURIOUS HUNGER (Broadstone Books, 2024). Her poems, essays, and reviews have appeared in O, The Oprah Magazine, New Ohio Review, Rattle, and elsewhere. She was a third-place co-winner of the 2023 Allen Ginsberg Award and received an honorable mention for the Rattle Poetry Prize. Her work has also received several Pushcart Prize nominations. She has an MFA in poetry from VCFA and is the founder of The Write Space, a co-working and literary hub for creative writers in The Valley Arts District of Orange, New Jersey.